Little Organizer Moment

I watched as Grace gathered her toys, each one individually, and placed them in the blue basket. She grasped each toy firmly with her small hands and took a moment to examine each one before placing it inside. She paused, looked at the basket, and then retrieved another toy, repeating it with growing confidence.

She seemed fully engrossed, her gaze focused and introspective. She stopped once, held two toys in her palms, and stared at both. She picked after a time, putting the toy inside tenderly before picking up the other.

Grace, you were so concentrated and problem-solving today! You were sorting and storing your toys so carefully, using your hands so well to place them neatly in the basket. You also showed patience and persistence, making positive choices along the way. It was wonderful to observe you.

Reflecting and Interpreting the Learning That Took Place

Grace is clearly learning important physical and thinking skills by doing this activity. She is developing her fine motor skills by grasping small objects and putting them away. She also demonstrates emergent problem-solving skills by selecting which toy she will pick up and place in the basket.

Grace's engagement in this activity also demonstrates her growing independence and concentration. She demonstrated interest as she looked into the basket, assessed where she was putting her toys, and sustained her attention throughout the activity.

Future Opportunities and Extension of Learning

What if you add some different baskets and containers so that you can learn about sorting by shape, size, and color? Maybe we can turn it into a game where you pick up the toys based on a prompt, such as asking for something red or something soft.

We can also read a sorting or tidying book, like The Very Hungry Caterpillar, to introduce you to sequencing and the idea of order. Softer music played during sorting may also make it even more pleasant!
